We're hearing more and more about a UK government plan to introduce 30-hour working weeks as a way of minimising job losses. The idea is that jobs would be reduced from 40 to 30 hours per week and the remainder of the time could be spent on holiday, family, or leisure. There's also talk about other ideas, such as work-life balance, which is rather less radical than 30-hour working weeks. More about work-life balance here. But what would happen if the Government imposed a 30-hour working week on all companies? What would it mean? Currently, the average person in the UK works 32 hours a week. The Government wants to cut this down to 30 hours, which is less than half the hours people currently work. Anecdotally, it's already happened for many employers. In 2012, a survey by tech company Intellimedi found that 57% of people worked more than 35 hours per week. Even though the survey wasn't as scientific as one could wish, it does give us an idea of the average working week in the UK. Many employers have already introduced the idea of shorter working hours, although they may not have been as open as the Government hopes to be. For example, at Google, engineers are now being asked to take time off for two weeks' paternity leave – something that's been made optional before. What would it mean for the economy? The Government predicts a small economic downturn of around 0.4%. The big question is how companies would cope with this. The UK economy grew at an average rate of 3.3% between 2011 and 2016, largely driven by retail and the financial services sectors. Now, if the Government's 82157476af
